The three authors take turns emulating their idols, who include Emily Dickinson, Billy Collins and Terrance Hayes. Complementing the infectious mood of tribute is the spirited mixed-media artwork by Holmes (Voice of Freedom), a harmonious riot of color, texture and pattern. •The New York Times Book Review Newbery medalist Kwame Alexander has come up with a fresh and joyful way to interest children in poetry...Holmes takes collage work to a new level, with gloriously colored art that, the closer you look, tells further stories within stories. excitements and small joys. Exemplary words and pictures make this a multicultural masterwork.

•Booklist (starred review)Caldecott Honor winner Holmes's (Voice of Freedom: Fannie Lou Hamer) textured-paper collages use bold, angular forms and sunlit colors to spotlight poets and their subject matter...The exercise of celebrating poets in their own voices leads naturally to the idea of the classroom writing prompt—which Colderley, writing haiku in the style of Basho, seems to anticipate: "Pens scratching paper/ Syllables counted with care/ Poets blossoming."

•Kirkus Reviews (starred review)Holmes's use of collage offers the perfect visual metaphor for the act of transforming borrowed forms and ideas into powerful original art. Such enjoyable poems! I have read them over and over.

Wonderful selection of poets and heartwarming poems in the same style. A real joy to read.

Love the poem "How to Write a Poem." Used during poetry unit especially with ELL students. Alexander did a great job of showing various styles in poetry.

Wonderful poetry. This is a great collection for kids and adults alike!

Colorful and interesting book.

Best book EVER to introduce kids to the magic of poetry

To say that this cover jumped out at me is an understatement! "Wonder" "Poems" "Celebrating" "Poets," "Kwame Alexander" and the fabulous art by Ekua Holmes immediately drew me in. This book contains poems by Alexander, Chris Colderley, and Marjory Wentworth, who wrote in styles and voices of favorite poets or allusions to them. The poets celebrated include Naomi Shihab Nye, Basho, Langston Hughes, Emily Dickinson, Pablo Neruda, Maya Angelou, and several other favorite poets from a variety of time periods. This book shouts JOY! Aimed at young people, it has brief, excellent information about the celebrated poets in the back. Introducing each of the three sections (Got Style?, In Your Shoes, and Thank You), Alexander writes a bit about what poetry is and how poets write what they write. Alexander explains in his preface that the book's title comes from a quote by Lucille Clifton. "Poems come out of wonder, not out of knowing." The poems are brought to vibrant life with Holmes' colorful collages. If you need a reason to celebrate, this is it! The book's poems also offer ways for you to celebrate your favorite poets and write poetry of your own.

I fell in love with this book as soon as I started reading the preface as the author explains his life growing up with books. His love for books and poetry influenced him to put together this lovely book of poems to introduce poetry to children. The poems in the book are written by Kwame Alexander, Chris Chris Colderley and Marjory Wentworth. The poems included here honor and celebrate twenty poets from the past and present including Robert Frost, Langston Hughes, Emily Dickinson, and Maya Angelou to name a few. The illustrations alone are beautiful and eye-catching. Once you get to the back, each celebrated poet is highlighted with information regarding their lives and works. In my opinion, this book belongs in every school, every library, and in every home where there are children. It's worth every penny and I'm happy to have it. 5**
